One of the biggest challenges that parents face when homeschooling is the fear of not being qualified to teach their children. However, Schepp argues that parents are the best teachers for their children. They know their children's individual learning styles and needs, and they can tailor their education to meet those needs.

Another challenge that parents face is the lack of resources and support. However, Schepp provides a wealth of resources and support in her book. She includes lesson plans, curriculum recommendations, and tips on how to connect with other homeschooling families.

Schepp also addresses the social concerns that some parents have about homeschooling. She argues that homeschooled children are just as socialized as other children, and they often have more opportunities to develop close relationships with their family and community members.

If you are considering homeschooling your children, "Anyone Can Homeschool" is a must-read. Schepp provides practical advice and encouragement for those who are just starting out, as well as those who are facing challenges. She will help you to overcome the obstacles to home education and give your children the best possible education.

Here are some of the obstacles that Schepp discusses in her book:

- Lack of time
- Financial concerns
- Lack of support
- Social concerns
- Academic concerns

- How to overcome these obstacles

Homeschooling can be a rewarding experience for both parents and children. However, it is important to be aware of the challenges that you may face and to have a plan in place to overcome them.
