Cats as Guardians and Symbols of the Divine

In ancient Egypt, cats were not mere companions but revered symbols of protection and the divine. They were closely associated with the goddess Bastet, the patron of cats, childbirth, and the home. Bastet was often depicted as a woman with a cat's head, embodying the nurturing and protective qualities of cats.

Cats were also revered for their ability to ward off evil spirits and protect children. They were often placed in tombs to safeguard the deceased on their journey to the afterlife. Their keen eyesight and hunting skills made them valued guardians and symbols of strength.

Cats in Art and Literature

Egyptian artists captured the grace and charm of cats in numerous statues, paintings, and other artworks.

The allure of cats in Egyptian culture extended to art and literature. They were frequently depicted in paintings, sculptures, and jewelry, capturing their grace, agility, and playful nature. Ancient Egyptian writers immortalized cats in stories, such as the tale of the cat that protected the infant pharaoh Horus from a venomous snake.

Lee's comprehensive research uncovers the fascinating role cats played in shaping the cultural fabric of ancient Egypt. From their divine status to their everyday lives, she paints a vivid picture of these enigmatic companions and their enduring legacy.
